TRANSPORTATION AND SUPPLY CHAIN

You strive to get everyone and everything where it needs to go, smoothly and on time. To succeed, your business must clear countless hurdles and comply with a myriad of federal, state, and local requirements affecting all aspects of operations – including a widely dispersed workforce. You are truly going places, and your employees will be the ones to get you there. But as issues like new technologies, disparate laws affecting pay and workplace safety, and the need to manage contingent staffing models multiply, you need experienced counsel that understands all the moving pieces to help navigate the road ahead..

Employers must deal with these disruptions while focusing on the business of growing, innovating, and delivering value to a global clientele that has no shortage of options when it comes to transportation and supply chain needs. Fisher Phillips' attorneys' specialized knowledge of these industries allows us to address legal concerns efficiently, creatively and cost effectively. We have no learning curve and pass the benefits of our experience on to clients in the aviation, maritime, ground transportation, warehousing, and logistics sectors so they can train their attention where it belongs -- on the already challenging pursuit of operating successful businesses. Our clients range from regional and local public transit agencies to international carriers, including leading passenger airlines, international trucking and freight carriers, express delivery services, third-party logistics companies, supply chain managers, and more.

Drawing on the extensive resources of one of the nation's leading management-side employment and labor law firms, and fluent in all applicable laws and regulations, we provide transportation and supply chain businesses a one-stop shop for all their workplace law needs, including:
