Partner Howard Mavity's blog entitled "Will OSHA's Shame Game Improve Workplace Safety?" was featured on Forbes.com.

In his blog, Howard explains that a proposal by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration to require employers to electronically submit data and then to make that data available online to the public, is part of a naming and shaming approach that is counterproductive for workplace safety.

Howard said the proposal could even encourage employers to suppress information out of fear they will be publicly ridiculed. Read the article on Forbes.com
