Chris Mills was quoted in the September 19, 2014 app.com article "Is Fantasy Football A Drain On Employers?"

In the article, Chris provides advice to employers on how to handle their employees playing fantasy football while they are at work.

"I would advise a client to think long and hard before they completely stamped out accessing it," Chris said. "They aren't going to be able to do it. Why undertake a fruitless venture?"

For employers it falls into a category of common sense. Policies that prohibit, say, sending personal emails or checking social media or looking at a bank account during work time are likely to backfire, making employees less productive, not more.

And if an employee isn't getting their work done, take it up with them personally.
