Clarence Belnavis was quoted in The Washington Post on February 12, 2015. The article “Love in The Time of Cubicles” discussed the increase of companies updating their policies regarding dating in the workplace.

Clarence was quoted on the difficulties of enforcing absolute dating ban policies in the workplace.

Not only are absolute bans nearly impossible to enforce, said Clarence, but they can put companies in the position of having to police dating between — and therefore make tough decisions on — two talented peers.

“I have clients who come to me and say our talent pool is narrow, or we’re unique in what we do, and people are just going to date in the workplace,” Clarence said. “What I don’t need is an archaic policy that bans it all. They used to be fairly formal and rigid, now they’re more relaxed.”
