Steve Bernstein was quoted in the Wall Street Journal on April 16, 2015. The article “Businesses Seek Guidance on New Labor Board Rule” discussed how a newly passed National Labor Relations Board rule that streamlines and expedites union organizing has businesses seeking strategic advice on how to stay union-free.

Steve said he has been fielding phone calls from clients at five times the usual rate, driven by businesses concerned about a new federal rule that could spur union organizing.

Businesses, Steve noted, are worried that they are ill-prepared for what could be a spurt of union activity as a result of the National Labor Relations Board rule, which streamlines and expedites union organizing.

“In a nutshell, reality is setting in...and we’re getting client inquiries at a more rapid clip,” said Steve.

Steve said businesses wary of a union “fear that they will lose that flexibility and the culture that many employees take for granted.”
