Steve Bernstein was quoted in the Washington Examiner on August 29, 2015. The article "Labor Board Ruling Will Create Major Confusion in Disputes: Critics" discussed the National Labor Relations Board recent ruling, in which they ruled that business can be found liable for the labor violations of another employer even if it had only "potential" control over the second employer's workers.

Steve was quoted on how the outcome of this ruling will effect collective bargaining agreements moving forward.

Collective bargaining under the new rule will be anything but stable, warned Steve. It will allow unions to target deep-pocketed companies, arguing they are joint employers even if they have little do with company that is the workers' primary employer.
