

Fantasy Football in the Office: A Penalty Flag for Business?

News

9.18.15

Jim Fessenden was quoted on Patch on September 18, 2015. The article “Fantasy Football in the Office: A Penalty Flag for Business?” discussed the provisions employers should take when bracing for America’s favorite sport and most popular fantasy league activities.

Jim said, it’s important for employers to set appropriate boundaries. It is equally important for employees to take precautions when it comes to participating in the leagues, making bets and taking part in these sporting events in the workplace.

He said:

- Technology has made it impossible to keep fantasy football games and league activities out of most workplaces. Game recaps and highlights are easily accessible, and sports shows can be streamed live from a variety of sources on computers, tablets and phones.
- How much energy a company wants to put into restricting this viewing and other league activities depends on its work environment. Not all workplaces need draconian regulations.
- Companies have options when it comes to employees watching game highlights and other sources to strategize for their next match-up. Employers can limit watching to break times and can encourage watching during break time by creating viewing options in break rooms.
- Short-term decreases in productivity can come with an opportunity to increase morale and teamwork through friendly rivalries.
- Office pools for money are forms of gambling and may be illegal under state law. Office pools for the sake of competition can boost morale.
- Many employers choose to allow office pools to exist in spite of the risks. Using some care in controlling the manner in which office pools are conducted may minimize the risk of consequences more serious than your fantasy football team holding the losing record as the season progresses.

To read the full article, please visit Patch.

Please reach out to our Media team for any news inquiries.

