In the article, "Gorsuch Would Bring Conservative Bona Fides to Labor Cases," featured in Bloomberg BNA, attorney Rich Meneghello discusses U.S. Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch's conservative legal view that he's bringing to the bench and the impact it could have on Labor and Employment questions.

He's a solid conservative who's "against second guessing employers' business judgment," Richard R. Meneghello, a management attorney with Fisher Phillips in Portland, Ore., told Bloomberg BNA.

But Gorsuch also has demonstrated an "independent streak" in employment law cases where he "doesn't mind ruling against employers if it's what he believes the law requires, regardless of his personal philosophy," he said.
