In the Kansas City Business Journal article, “KC lawyer: Unions Not Done Fighting After Supreme Court Loss,” Jessie Bustamante explains that the Supreme Court of the United States decision leaves unanswered questions for unions - most notably whether unions will have to continue providing services for people not paying agency fees.

“To the extent that unions have already taken up affirmative actions for non-members who paid agency fees, my guess is those activities will likely continue,” Jessie said “But in the future, to the extent that non-members request representation or other assistance from the union and they opted out of paying these fees, that’s where you’ll see a lot of questions arise.”
