In an interview with NPR's Morning Edition, Philadelphia partner Lori Armstrong Halber discusses the growing momentum in state legislatures for paid family leave. Lori says: "not every company opposes paying into a state-required program. Many small employers cannot otherwise afford to offer paid leave." In addition, Armstrong says: "it is a benefit that will attract the best and the brightest especially as it has become so hard to find and attract workers. And, frankly, it is something that [workers] expect and demand, as part of this is a societal change." According to Lori, state governments also recognize that the gridlocked federal government is unlikely to enact a national paid leave program. She added, "I think we're going to continue to see states address areas like this where the federal government hasn't been able to make any movement."
