

Phoenix Partner Provides Framework for Employers Facing Instances of Remote Misconduct

News

5.11.20

Many employers have been forced to shift to telework as their “new normal” amid the COVID-19 pandemic. In an interview with HR Dive, Shayna Balch discusses remote employee misconduct and how employers can prevent and deal with these situations from a distance. Shayna notes that employers should regularly remind remote workers of workplace expectations with a steady flow of positive, fair and transparent communication. She goes on to explain that if a complaint of remote misconduct arises, HR should take it seriously and should not treat it any differently than if it originated at the physical work-site. Shayna also provides a helpful framework that employers should consider when addressing and investigating instances of remote misconduct.
