

Co-Chair of Firm's Healthcare Practice Talks to Forbes About Vaccines in the Workplace

News

3.18.21

In an interview with Forbes, Kevin Troutman explains whether employers can require employees to get vaccinated before returning to the workplace. Legally, Kevin explains, employers can require at-will employees to get vaccinated. There are, however, exceptions to this rule involving religious or medical accommodations. When encouraging workers to come back to the office, he recommends employers work with their employees as much as possible by listening to their concerns and providing information about safety precautions taken in the workplace. This, he says, will help avoid coming across as strictly dictating and create a better return-to-work experience for everyone.
