In an interview with The Washington Post, Kevin Troutman considers whether an employer can terminate an employee for failing to comply with a vaccine mandate. Kevin says that if the employer is considering appropriate religious and other accommodations, they can terminate a non-compliant employee. But as the vaccine continues to be tested in federal courts and some states elect to pass competing bans, he said "it's gotten to be a much more complicated evaluation and you really have to look at all of those areas before you can make a decision as an employer, just to make sure that you're on solid footing from a legal standpoint."
