

Portland Attorney Discusses How Employers Can Avoid Going Mad During March Madness

Publication

3.19.19

In his bylined article for Cascade Business News titled “The Madness of March in the Workplace,” Portland Associate Alexander A. Wheatley calls March Madness the most sustained workday distraction of the year, indicating it can be a worrying time for employers. Alex encourages employers to allow employees to organize their own office pools and to establish clear policies on gambling in the workplace. He also encourages employers to enforce productivity standards during the tournament and accept the fact that they cannot micromanage every moment of the day.
