Brian Coughlin was interviewed by International Employment Lawyer about the many challenges that immigration lawyers have dealt with over the last couple of years, how each presidential administration has impacted this work, and how and how his recent move to Fisher Phillips will enhance the service he is able to offer his clients.

“Business immigration is itself a form of employment law,” he said. “Our team assists clients with a particular subset of their workforce – foreign personnel – with issues pertaining to work authorization, permanent residence, prevailing wage compliance, and relocation.

He also mentioned Fisher Phillips’ renowned national immigration team.

“The prospect of coming onto this broad platform, with all of its depth and scalability, was the perfect opportunity for our team. With the inclusion of myself, my associate Tatiana Chiu, and our group of para-professional and administrative colleagues, the firm now has a strong immigration presence for New England.”
