

Massachusetts Franchise Owner-Operators May Be Employees of Franchisors

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court just held that 7-Eleven franchisees may be employees of 7-Eleven under Massachusetts wage and hour law. The March 24 decision in Dhananjay Patel v. 7-Eleven, Inc. will have significant implications for businesses operating within franchise models. What does your franchised business need to know?

Background

In 2018, a group of 7-Eleven franchise owners sued 7-Eleven, alleging their franchise agreements misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of the Massachusetts independent contractor law, M.G.L. c. 149, §148B. Among other things, the franchisees alleged agreements with 7-Eleven required them to turn over a substantial amount of their profits to the franchisor as franchise fees and they were required to follow myriad other rules, including operating their stores around the clock, using 7-Eleven's payroll system, stocking inventory sold by 7-Eleven's preferred vendors, and more.

In 2020, a federal court judge granted 7-Eleven summary judgment on the franchisees' claims, holding the Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) Franchise Rule conflicted with the Massachusetts independent contractor statute, and therefore the independent contractor statute did not apply. The franchisees appealed to the First Circuit Court of Appeals, which acknowledged that the question of whether the FTC regulation actually conflicted with the independent contractor law had yet to be decided by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court. Rather than guess what the SJC might do, the First Circuit asked the SJC to answer the question in the first instance.

The Independent Contractor Law

Massachusetts law establishes a three-pronged "ABC" test to determine whether someone is an employee or an independent contractor. Under the test, the law presumes employment status if an individual performs services for the putative employer. The putative employer can counter that presumption by establishing:

1. the individual is free from control and direction in performing services;
2. the service performed is outside of the putative employer's usual course of business; and

3. the individual is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, occupation, profession, or business of the same nature as that involved in the service performed.

If a putative employer cannot establish all three of the factors, then the independent contractor must be classified as an employee. They would then be entitled to various benefits afforded employees under the law.

The Franchise Rule

Conversely, the Franchise Rule does not concern employee misclassification. The FTC adopted the rule in the late 1970s to combat widespread deception in the sale of franchises. Among other mandates, it requires franchisors to make certain presale disclosures to prospective franchisees. As relevant to the classification issue, the rule defines a franchise as a continued commercial relationship where the franchisor “will exert or has authority to exert a significant degree of control over the franchisee’s method of operation, or provide significant assistance in the franchisee’s method of operation.”

The SJC Decision

In response to the certified question, the SJC held that franchises are not categorically exempt from the ABC test, and that in certain instances a franchisee may be an employee under Massachusetts law.

While 7-Eleven had argued the Franchise Rule required the franchisor to exercise control over its franchisees, and prong A of the ABC test required a contractor to be free from control, the ABC test could not apply and was preempted by the conflicting federal regulation. The SJC disagreed, finding the Franchise Rule was merely a disclosure rule and did not conflict with state law.

In so holding, the court noted the state legislature did not explicitly exclude franchisees from the independent contractor law. The SJC opined that categorically excluding franchisees from the ABC test could allow employers to evade wage-and-hour obligations by labeling what is actually an employment relationship as a “franchise” arrangement.

In addition, the court noted that nothing in the independent contractor law prohibited “legitimate” franchise relationships among independent entities not created to evade wage laws, but whether a particular franchise is legitimate or not will be a fact-specific inquiry. Importantly, the court did not decide whether the 7-Eleven franchisees in this case are in fact employees. That question will return to the federal court to consider.

What’s Next?

The Massachusetts ABC test is notoriously difficult for employers to overcome. In light of the court’s decision, we are likely to see a wave of wage and hour litigation by franchise owners against their franchisors.

This decision will have significant consequences for franchisors in Massachusetts. If an individual business owner previously classified as a franchisee is actually an employee under the ABC Test, then the parent company is subject to state wage laws. This means certain pay arrangements common to franchisor-franchisee relationships, such as having franchisees draw earnings from their store's profits after paying franchisee fees to the parent company, will likely be unlawful. In addition, franchisors may be subject to requirements to pay overtime, offer earned sick time, and pay for unemployment and workers' compensation insurance for their franchisees (and the franchisee's employees).

Franchisors should examine their agreements and relationships to determine whether a "legitimate" franchise arrangement exists, and take steps to comply with the ABC test should they wish to continue using the independent contractor model.
