In an interview with the Washington Business Journal, Theresa Connolly shared some insight on how COVID-19 employment-related lawsuits have changed the way employers do business and manage their employees.

Theresa pointed to vaccination mandate challenges as one claim that didn't make it very far in the courts. Even as employee protests continue, courts have sided with healthcare and educational employers. In one such case, the court pointed out that the employees were free to seek similar jobs within their chosen professional elsewhere in the area. The court also cited precedent that permitted governments to mandate vaccines for all adults, not just municipal employees.
