

Regional Managing Partner Shares Insights on Discrimination Claim Tied to COVID-19

News 7.15.22

In an interview with WOUB Public Media, Ed Harold shares his insights on a case in which an employee claimed she was fired because her employer thought she had COVID-19. The employee alleged that her firing violated state and federal anti-discrimination laws and raises tough legal questions about whether COVID-19 qualifies as a disability.

Ed explains that whether COVID qualifies as a disability will depend on the severity. "What these cases are saying is that if somebody has a severe case of COVID where they cannot breathe and they can't get out of bed, they have severe symptoms even if it is only two weeks. That two-week period of COVID could be a disability."

To read the article visit WOUB Public Media.

Please reach out to our Media team for any news inquiries.

Related People

Edward F. Harold Regional Managing Partner 504.592.3801 Email

Related Offices

New Orleans