OVERVIEW

Max Mosley defends employers in labor and employment disputes, handling matters from single-plaintiff discrimination and retaliation claims to wage and hour disputes and wrongful termination cases. He has advised businesses on workplace compliance, policy development, and risk management, as well as guided them through litigation in both state and federal courts, appearing before administrative agencies and managing cases from pre-suit through trial.

His litigation background includes drafting pleadings, motions, and pretrial briefs, taking and defending depositions, and managing complex discovery. Max has prepared and delivered oral arguments for summary judgment and pretrial motions, and brings second-chair trial experience, including cross-examining fact witnesses before a jury. His client work has involved representing public schools on discrimination, employment, and policy matters.

Before joining Fisher Phillips, Max was an associate at a Kansas City-based civil litigation firm, where he advised clients on litigation matters and contributed to the firm's employment and labor law practice. He previously interned for a federal district court judge in the Western District of Missouri, assisting with legal research and observing proceedings before the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Max also brings nearly a decade of experience in education, including six years as a public high school teacher in New York City. He worked in special education in Vermont and held teaching and educational leadership roles in Micronesia and the Marshall Islands. This background gives him firsthand insight into the operational and workplace challenges facing educational institutions.
