OVERVIEW

Tate Blunt represents employers in labor and employment matters, drawing on his legal training and experience supporting employment litigation, legal research, and case strategy.

Before joining Fisher Phillips as an associate, Tate worked as a summer associate at the firm, where he researched employment law issues, drafted legal memoranda and other documents, and assisted attorneys on a range of labor and employment matters.

Tate previously served as a law clerk to Judge Neal McBrayer of the Tennessee Court of Appeals, where he conducted legal research, drafted portions of judicial opinions, and prepared memoranda analyzing legal issues. He also observed oral arguments and assisted with matters before the court.

His additional legal experience includes working at a different Tennessee law firm and the Office of the Tennessee Attorney General, where he researched a variety of legal issues, drafted motions and memoranda, and gained exposure to litigation and dispute resolution.

Tate earned his J.D., summa cum laude, from Belmont University College of Law, graduating second in his class. While at Belmont University College of Law, Tate became a member of the Belmont Law Review and participated in Belmont's Moot Court Program. He received graduation honors for both, as well as additional honors for his pro bono work and for completing every level of Belmont's field placement program. He earned his bachelor's degree, also summa cum laude, from Lee University.
