Managing Employees and Social Media: Where is the line?

In the last 10 years we have seen a rapid increase in cases involving social media. Additionally, for years, the NLRB has taken a strong stance against employers that took action against employees who made statements on social media, even when those statements were disparaging to the employer. Recently, the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated President Obama's recess appointments to the NLRB, creating uncertainty about the effect of prior NLRB decisions. In addition, new Court decisions give us more guidance on what social media policies should look like and how employers should approach issues involving social media. In this breakfast briefing, we'll address best practices for employers regarding social media in light of new developments in the law and provide tips for managing employee's behavior on social media.
