Non-Exempt Employees – Are you Sure you have Properly

Classified your Employees & Contractors? Classifying employees is one of those tasks that most employers believe has been handled properly. Yet we continue to see misclassification lawsuits and the inconvenient truth about these lawsuits is that the potential liability is massive. The reality is that there are many positions employers commonly misclassify. Office managers, supervisors, executive assistants, and IT personnel are routinely thought to be exempt from overtime, when in actuality, they may not be. The same is commonly true of independent contractors and even the “very best” independent contractor agreements cannot save you. This briefing will discuss those employees that you think are exempt, that may in fact, not be, as well as the potential repercussions, and some key do’s and don’ts when classifying your employees.
